

Report writing guide

ClimateXChange (CXC) reports respond to policy questions raised by the Scottish Government, highlighting relevant findings.

Our audience is time poor and not science specialists. It is important to keep it short, up to 25 pages, and in plain language.

The reader should be able to skim your text and understand:

- > what is the problem/issue/challenge
- > why it matters
- > what can be done.

Answer the policy questions. This is the most important point in all CXC outputs. We set the science in context, explaining the meaning of the research findings. We are constructive, identify solutions and focus on meaning, not method, in presenting our work.

Use annexes for technical detail and methodology. These aspects of our work should be available and accessible but are not of primary interest to the policy reader. This sets CXC's work apart from traditional academic work, where the method is more prominent.

Reports over eight pages should have an executive summary of no more than two pages. Reports should not go over 25 pages. CXC can advise on the appropriate structure for the executive summary.

Make it visual if a graph/infographic can illustrate your report. Seek inspiration in books or online resources on best data visualisation. However, consider that for accessibility you should not use images of text. Any visual way of conveying data such as a table, chart or image has to be described in the surrounding text.

Highlight benefits of your work. Quantify them if you can. How much public money can be saved, directly or through better value for money? What would it bring to Scotland?

Do not suggest that further research is needed, unless there is a clear reason and it is linked to achieving a policy outcome.

Plain English

Keep sentences short, with 15-20 words. Most commas can be replaced by a full stop.

Use active verbs. These highlight the action and the actors.

- ✓ Government will review the plan next year
- ✗ A review of the plan will be undertaken by government next year

Use 'you' and 'we'. Be personal as if you were speaking to your reader.

Use clear wording. Define any terms that may be read differently by different audiences. Everyday language does not make your text less credible. It makes it more accessible for anyone who may want to read it.

Proofread. Check your text beyond relying on Word's squiggly lines.

Formatting CXC outputs

Please use the CXC template to format reports. This guide uses this formatting.

CXC works to make all outputs as accessible and user-friendly as possible. The reporting format for your project will be discussed at the project start-up meeting, when you will also receive the template.
